

Movement Latency and Distance Perception in Virtual Reality

Mac Coleman

Overview

- Users of virtual environments consistently underestimate distances relative to themselves.
- Poor distance estimation leads users to believe environments are smaller than they really are. This causes issues in architecture and design
- Head mounted displays (HMDs) inherently have latency between when a user's motions are received and when those motions are drawn on screen.

Design

Methods

Next Steps